Value of the Month : Cheerfulness

Good advice - Rod Smith Column

Today, and every day, be the adult you hope your children will become. How else will they learn?

- ◆ Stop blaming the teachers, coaches, or the school for your child's every challenge, difficulty, or hurdle. Blame restricts maturing, yours and theirs.
- ◆ Stop blaming the government, the economy, or prejudice for every distress or dilemma you face, unless you think blame will be a good tool for your child to take into adulthood.
- ◆ If you want your children to be adults who take responsibility for their lives, then show them how it's done.
- ◆ Demonstrate, by your own display of excellent manners, the manner in which you hope your child will navigate life and relationships. It is true, they are going to watch and learn from multiple sources, but you are their primary resource when it comes to how they will respect and treat others. Little eyes are watching.
- ◆ Your children won't forget your temper tantrums no matter how young they may be; they will emulate them.
- ◆ Respect, visit, and be kind to the elderly so they know exactly how to do it when it's your turn.
- ◆ Dismiss no one; look down on no one. Young eyes and ears are absorbing how to be in the world, and you, parents, are the primary teachers.
